

A prominent public mural that has transformed a local eyesore into a welcoming landmark that has come to define the area and its history.

This project was conceived, managed and delivered by Signal Project in 2004 and remains the largest permanent public graffiti art mural ever commissioned in the UK.

The Kilburn Tube Mural is located on a busy road serving as an artery into London from The North and outside the heavily used Kilburn Tube Station.

The 300m² and 8m high mural spans four walls over property belonging to London Underground and two local authorities, managed by Kilburn Town Centre Partnership. Signal managed the project so that all council concerns were addressed and all regulations were adhered to.

Signal invested time in speaking with local graffiti artists, running workshops at local schools and youth clubs and consulting key community groups and historians before commencing the final design.

Keenly aware of the issues around the public perception of graffiti, we deliberately set our own design brief and chose a uniform colour palette, illustrative style and historical content that could offer the onlooker something beyond the obvious.

SIGNAL

During the painting of the mural, we displayed information about the design and its historical and community relevance so that passers by had a better understanding of the project. This was a great cohesive tool in the community as many locals learned things about an area they had lived in their entire life.

The Kilburn Tube Mural was painted by renown graffiti artists (Snug, Dane, Bleach, Busk and Tizer) with the assistance of a young local apprentice, involving many of the community in the consultation process. This was key to its success in being welcomed by locals and regular passers-by.

Signal secured match funding from the Arts Council England and Camden Streetscape to deliver the Kilburn

Tube project - a public mural that was groundbreaking in its scale and prominence.

The biggest sign of the success of this project is that the mural has not been vandalised once since its completion in 2004, despite a footfall of millions past it every week.

“On behalf of the Kilburn Partnership, I would like to thank you for your hard work developing and delivering the mural project at Kilburn Tube station over the last year. Local feedback on the design quality of the mural has been extremely positive – in fact (and I understand this is quite unusual for a public art project!) we haven’t received a single complaint or criticism.”

“...if we had to spend a few coins on any of London’s murals it would be these, created in 2004 by Signal Project as the largest commissioned work of graffiti in the UK...A splendid attention to detail, with many subtle references to local themes.
